Director's Notes

A huge part of my life is about the experiences I have with other people. Last November, I engaged in one of the most enjoyable, yet different types of experiences ever. I became part of a "human library." You are probably saying, "A what?"

The human library movement began in Denmark seventeen years ago. It now takes place in over 30 countries. This was the third annual Purdue University Human Library, hosted by the Krannert School of Management. I found the experience very rewarding.

The key objective is to construct a positive framework for conversations that challenge stereotypes and prejudices. In human libraries, people are books that go on loan to readers. To be read, these human books must be open to being questioned and to providing spoken answers.

Few people know I am an armchair author. Although I wrote a chapter for an academic book about librarianship, I have not yet written or published any books under my own name or a pseudonym. Someday I really want to see a book I wrote published, on the shelf with my name on the spine, in a bookstore or library. That may not happen in my lifetime, but a person can dream.

Let's get back to Purdue's human library. It gave me the rare opportunity to be a living, breathing book. As a book I had a known title and four identified chapters. I was actually checked out and read multiple times during the allotted time frame. Mostly, I was read by one person at a time, but twice that day two people read me at one time. The readings took place in 30-minute, timed segments.

Was this human library event really so different from what a talker like me does every day? In fact, it was really different for several reasons! On a daily basis, I don't usually open myself up to be asked random questions, particularly of a personal nature. It was also different because the readers were complete strangers, most of whom I never will see again. Finally, these exchanges were a willing and concerted effort on the part of my readers to explore his/her awareness of perceived stereotypes and prejudices. People do not choose to embark on such revealing journeys every day.

Ultimately, human libraries are meant to share the stories of one's life and create dialogs. As a recent column attested, I am a storyteller. This was a distinctly different form of storytelling and a truly enjoyable experience on several levels.

This unique library concept connects back to my longstanding commitment to issues of diversity and inclusion. It was encouraging to see readers who found all 43 human books compelling. I was delighted people seemed interested in the Jos N. Holman story. I'm thankful to have a story to tell.

With 15 years at TCPL, I hope to continue to build my story with wonderful customer interactions and experiences. Who knows, one day TCPL might host its own human library event!

Jos N. Holman
